and the Supreme Court had decided that the title of the law was defective, and that the law applied only to pool selling on faces outside of Virginia. There was no pool selling at St. Asaphs. Mr. Burko went deeply into the law of gambling, and made an able argument, if not a convincing one.

Councilman Frank Spinke told me today he did not believe there was a man in the city who could form the faintest idea of the amount given in charity every year by "Mick" Hill. Hill is convinced he is going a lawful business. He is understood to have obtained the opinion of a leading lawyer of Richmond to the effect that he was not violating the Virginia statute in making books on races run outside the State, and a lawyer from Philadelphia, after a careful examination of the law on the subject, gave the opinion that the business was within the law.

Resent Outside Criticism.

The people of Alexandria resent, and properly, it appears, the crusade which a certain paper of Washington, and certain people of this city, made against St. Asaphs' establishment, and have nothing to say of the betting ring at Bennings in the District of Columbia. The track, on which real horses ran and made and lost money for their owners and the crowds in the grand stand and about the betting ring. It was an outland track-that is, it was not in the national circuit, because winter racing was allowed. The Maupin bill was passed by the Virginia Legislature, and bookmaking thereby became unlawful. It was known to everybody that horse racing would cease to exist, even in Kentucky, if betting on the "ponies" were absolutely prohibited. The sport is royal no doubt, but the betting and not the horse running is the real sport in the minds of most frequenters of the track, and when the former is eliminated the racing ends of itself. That was the result of the passage of the Maupin bill by the Virginia General Assembly, St. Asaphs went out of business as a race track.

Bookmaking Joint.

Bookmaking Joint.

But it entered on a career which was destined to give it an infinitely wider reputation. Some Alexandria people and some Washington people conceived the fidea of establishing a bookmaking joint on the site of the old track, close to the national capital as it was, and yet far away from the realm of a metropolitan police. Perhaps it never entered the pool room that there was any danger of the police of Alexandria Interfering. The track is within a mile of the corporation in line of the city of Alexandria. The court has decided that the city authorities have concurrent jurisdiction with the authorities of Alexandria county within this area, and hence the trial of to-day, St. Asaphs, as a bookmaking place, attained a degree of prosperity never dreamt of by the people who ran it as a tracing point. The old grand stand was boarded in and furnished for a pool room, and while the place is perhaps the drearies of any in America into which, the public is invited to enter, it seems to have answered eyery purpose.

Immediately below the blackboards is a lorg, high counter, like those seen in any bar-room, and behind this are seated the bookmakers on their high stools, while walking along on a narrow shelf at the foot of the boards, behind them again, are the assistant clerks, changing the olds as the returns come in from the iracks, and posting the horses, who win and those who get place. "The also rans" have no mention at St. Asaphi. To the right of the blackboards is a high seat for the telegraph operator, and as he sits on high, dispensing the news as it is toked off, he reminds one of nothing so much as a police justice, passing sentence on a motiey crew that files before him.

A Motley Crew.

And it is surely a moticy crew. Beggars and thieves stand check by jowl, watch-ing those boards, and the nonchalant-erks who chalk down the names of the winners with as much sang frold is is

He falled several times, but finally he secured the indictments of Hill, Louis Barge and Charles Burlingame, telegraph operator at St. Asaphs, charging them with "setting up a gaining table of the like kind as keno, under the denomination of bookmaking on horse races, and of the like kind as keno and faro, under the denomination of commission betting on horse races, and of the like kind as keno and faro, under the denomination of commission betting on horse races, and of the Circuit Court. The question raised by the term, "of the like kind," Mr. Mackey held to be one for the consideration of the jury.

It was not necessary, according to his position, to show that there was any resemblance between bookmaking and faro undirection, to show that there was any resemblance between bookmaking and faro and keno, in so far as the rules and regulations of these procedures and games are concerned, but only that the chances of winning and losing are similar.

No Place for Women.

The distinguishing mark of St. Asaphs is the dirt. I have never been in the place when it appeared to have, been swept within the past week. A porker is not a man or woman in the whole bunch that does not think or hope this may be his or her lucky day, the turning point. The merits of the various entries are discussed constantly on the twenty-minute run to the pool room, but everybody is on his feet, ready to hustle over to the betting shed before the cars stop. Up the long board walk they hasten, eager to throw away their money to the sweating bookies behind the counter. The first sign of business is the agent with his envelopes containing tips on the races of the afternoon. Some stop to buy, but most of the visitors hurry on. Almost
